

A note from Liz

Thanks to all for welcoming me as a part of your conference. It looks like it will be an exciting weekend. I wanted to include a couple of websites that might be of interest to you that relate to the keynote:

The Science Choreography site at Wesleyan University is filled with ideas for combining science and art. You will find videos of dances about science, tools for embodied learning, and modules that include lessons and supplemental materials. The site investigates a kinesthetic approach to problem solving, learning, and discovery.

The Dance Exchange d-lab contains instructions for a variety of art-making techniques and concise descriptions of my principles and practices for creating work. On the site, you will find additional content exploring the theory, background, and applications of many of these ideas. The toolbox has information that is relevant for K-12 teachers, administrators, and teaching artists—and many others in positions beyond academia.

Best of luck to you and all your good work!

Liz

For more information about Liz, visit www.lizlerman.com

Hiking the Horizontal and other writings/publications: www.lizlerman.com/writingsLL.html.